DESCRIPTION

The Local Gazetteers Terminology workshop gathers together comprehensive research projects comparatively investigating how Chinese Local Gazetteers recorded names for things across territories and periods. Together, we will investigate different methods—clustered or decentralized, generally presented or regionally specific—that are used to record representational formats: texts, objects, genres, and terms. We tackle these issues by re-imagining local gazetteers beyond their traditional role as a source of specific local information. Exploiting the possibilities offered by digital humanities for processing and analysing large text corpora, the Chinese Local Gazetteers is addressed as a whole, the entire genre becomes one large database.

In this workshop six senior scholars work collaboratively to investigate the methodology of treating the whole genre of Chinese Local Gazetteers as a database. We will ask, what can our digital tools bring to the study of knowledge terminology in local gazetteers? By quickly extracting and expediently analyzing data from local gazetteers across regions, it is possible to deal with large amounts of data and to look into the materials' terminology variations in a continuous and complete way.
